Dot Pattern Light: an evolving project

A vertical expansion of the collection

Dot Pattern Light by the maestri Charles and Ray Eames is a key example of Cassina's ability to transform an abstract sign into a living element. This year the lamp, composed of luminous rods and spheres arranged in cross-shaped compositions, has been developed into a new vertical pendant light, distinguished by a bold and vibrant design.

A luminous new icon

Through careful research and engineering, Cassina has given three-dimensional form to the renowned pattern born from the talent of Charles and Ray Eames, translating it into a creative structure in which each element contributes to defining a coherent, modular and recognisable system.

In a vision oriented towards infinite possibilities of evolution, Cassina launches a new decorative interpretation of the pendant lamp with strong visual impact that complements the wall-mounted and horizontal pendant models presented last year.

This suspension lamp was inspired by an original Eames drawing conceived for a showroom but was never produced. Composed of six luminous spheres that extend downwards through the darkness, Dot Pattern Light elongates as it explores the vertical dimension of light, lending itself to large domestic settings with high ceilings, as well as to the contract sector.

This new vertical suspension lamp is available in matt white and matt black, in continuity with the graphic character of the entire collection, enhancing the contrast between its structure and light source. Through this new interpretation, which engages with space much like a sculpture, light is modulated not only in terms of intensity, but also of rhythm, distribution and spatial perception.

From a graphic element to the Cassina Lighting Collection

The projects of Charles and Ray Eames are preserved at the Eames Office, the design studio founded by the duo in 1941 and now led by their grandchildren. Since 2024, in collaboration with the Eames Office and Form Portfolios, Cassina has transformed their creative legacy into a lighting collection that combines philological fidelity and innovation.
